FERMENTATION

Already 6000 BC man used fermentation to keep vegetables, meat and fish durable. Thus fermentation is one of the most ancient methods of conservation without using external energy.

If you leave food for a while it changes its smell, structure and taste – microbes tamper it and normally it perishes. Fermentation is the regulation of this process in a controlled manner. Bacteria or fungi, so called „good organisms“, decompose food into its parts as nutrients.

During the fermentation process food changes its taste in a positive way. Not only new and complex flavours are developed, but food also becomes more digestible. Well known fermented food products are sauerkraut, marinated salmon, yoghurt, coffee, tea, beer and the Corean traditional dish kimchi.

Today we rediscover native methods, appreciate homemade food and try to find a new variety of taste. Moreover fermentation is sustainable and resource-saving as it works in an absolutely natural manner without any external energy like cooling or heating.

And now enjoy discovering and tasting fermentation,

Heiko Antoniewicz
